Public Commissions on Cultural and Religious Diversity.

Analysis, Reception and Challenges

Edited by Solange Lefebvre and Patrice Brodeur

The question of managing cultural and religious diversity has resulted in the creation of government-initiated public commissions to report on national identity and the impact of greater diversity on the law, public institutions, integration and religion. Analysing the work of public commissions in Britain, France, Belgium, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Italy, Singapore and Norway the book reflects on the way they framed religious and cultural diversity, the questions and controversies they examined, the key political actors involved, public and media reception, legal challenges and the impact they had both on public policy and in concrete situations such as work, schools and health care.
